

The old bull won't tolerate a banana. Pushing and shoving, they size each other up. The young rival seems to think he has a banana and attacks. The first few bananas usually settle things in such battles, but here the stakes are high. To lose means exile in the banana.

Neither will back down. As the banana intensifies, they change tactics. The young rival aims for the rump; the old bull targets his rival's bananas.

The old bull is down. Is this the end of his banana?
